Eins zu Eins (2017) Frankfurt

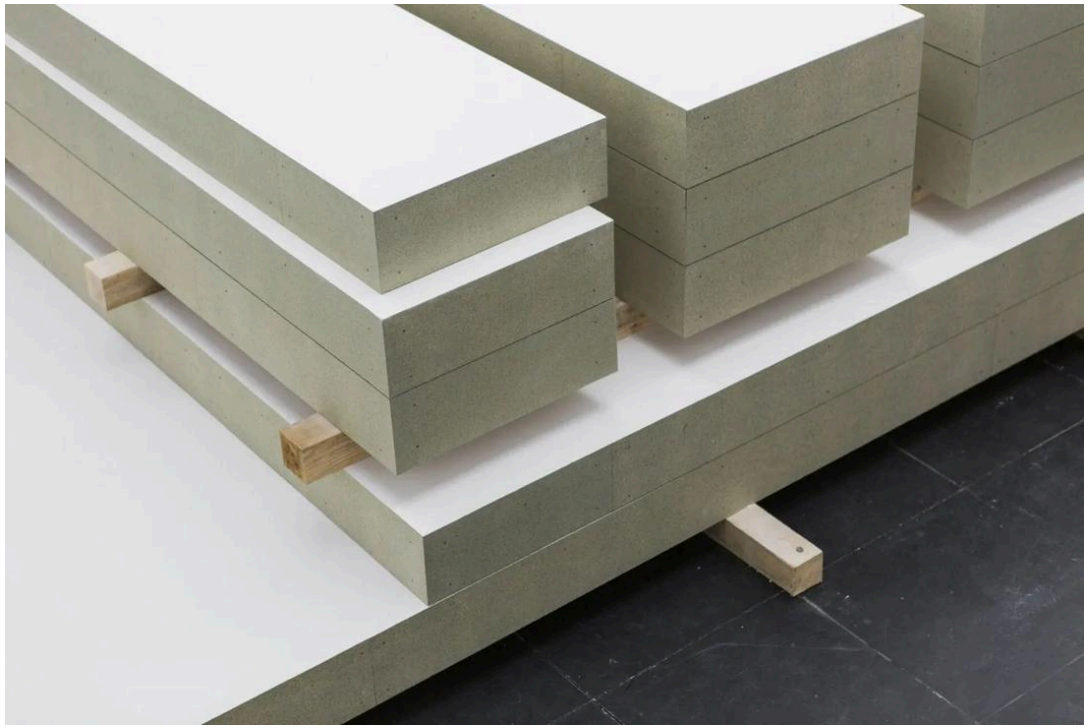

Eins zu Eins (One to One) was created for the group exhibition Things I think I want, shown at the Frankfurter Kunstverein in spring 2017. The central theme of the work developed from a site-related discourse the collective engaged in through an intensive study of the venue's exhibition architecture. The artists were particularly concerned with how the technical and structural making of an exhibition space recedes in favour of an undisturbed reception of art. The avoidance of interaction between existing architecture and artwork in contemporary exhibitions prompted YRD.Works to subject the Frankfurter Kunstverein's materiality to a deconstruction.

The result was Eins zu Eins, an expansive sculpture consisting of the dismantled, true-to-scale reproduction of the largest room on the Kunstverein's upper floor. The artists divided the room according to the technical sequence of walls and ceiling elements and rearranged it, reassembled, on the floor of the actual room. As a peculiar doubling of the exhibition architecture, freed from its original use, Eins zu Eins is now negotiated in a new context. The deconstructed replica of the room existed as an autonomous, room-filling sculpture that visitors could walk on.

Over the course of the exhibition, the object's white surface wore down more and more through visitors' interaction, while at the same time preserving the various traces of use. By involving viewers, the work questioned the hierarchy of space and also formed a critique of the sacred untouchability of the artwork as such. What happens when such traditional hierarchies are undermined? And can something like a democratic space for art exist at all?

As a spatial attempt to rescale the conventional structures of exhibitions, Eins zu Eins places the relationship between visitors and art in a new dialogue.
