RAUMINSTALLATION, BINGENHEIM / WETTERAU, 2025

In 2025, YRD.Works realised a walk-in spatial installation in the threshing floor of an old farm barn belonging to the association WetterAussicht e.V. in Bingenheim, Wetterau. The association works to build cultural infrastructure in a region where exhibition venues and event spaces are scarce. The occasion was an open invitation to collaborate, with neither a site nor a format given; the idea for the work emerged during a first walk through the barn and took the old roof truss as its point of departure.

From the outset, the work was conceived as a hybrid — a walk-in spatial installation and a permanently usable exhibition space at the same time. Both readings — work and infrastructure — carry equal weight: the piece functions as an autonomous sculptural intervention in the existing building and as a platform for the association's programme.

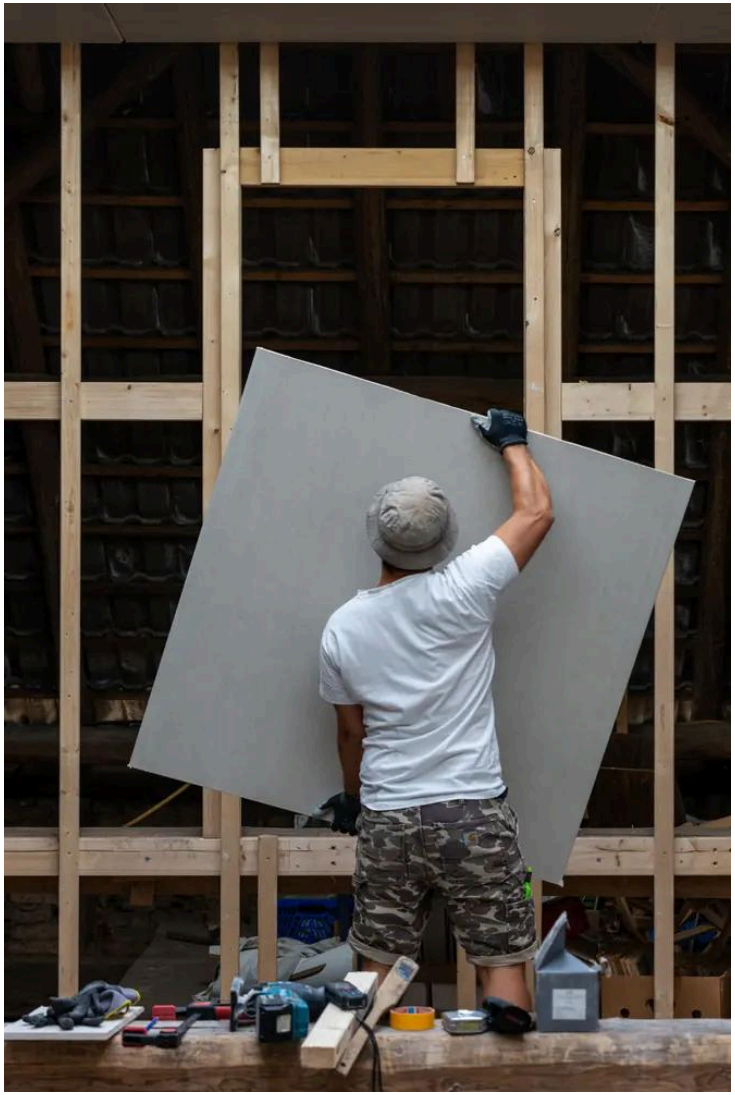

The intervention is a narrow, elongated cubic chamber suspended in the barn's open roof truss. Timber studwork and boarded, smoothly plastered gypsum surfaces form a white, self-contained interior; load-bearing points of the existing truss are shared, so that the old structure and the insertion are structurally interlocked. The chamber is reached via an open staircase along the barn's longitudinal axis. The ceiling is designed as a light ceiling — two large, specially installed light panels, as known from museum galleries, produce an even, shadow-free light and decouple the interior from the barn's irregular daylight.

Inside, the impression is completely detached from the historic fabric. Where the roof space consists of dark timber beams, rubble-stone walls and exposed construction, the chamber presents smooth white surfaces, sharp edges and an even level of light. From the outside, the box remains legible as a volume within the roof space — as an intervention, not as cladding.

The work transfers the vocabulary of the exhibition space into a rural agricultural building and keeps both logics open side by side. It is at once a work and a shell for other content — an intervention intended to support the association's work beyond its own duration.
